Call for papers

The focus on practice in music research is long overdue. As an impelling alternative to traditional musicological approaches, the study of practices can promote a more dynamic understanding of music as art and action. In fact, the establishment of a new field of research – not based on ideation and preconceived systematisation – is a reasonable ambition if we choose to pursue this path.

In the upcoming issues of Music & Practice, we would like to further explore some of the following questions:

- How can your study of artistic practices lead to new knowledge?
- How may studies of practice lead to better practice?
- What defines a good and desirable practice?
- What kind of problems can a study of practice solve?
- If practice is a conceivable entity, how can we identify and comprehend its constituting parts? What are (defines?) the elements of a given practice?
- What is the relationship between practice and artistic or aesthetic quality? Is it worthwhile to study practice in art without addressing the question of quality?
